

Women's Victimization in Transitional Justice and their Fight for Democracy and Human Rights:
The Story of Taiwan

Yi-Li Lee

Research Working Paper Series

March 2018

HRP 18-001

The views expressed in the HRP Research Working Paper Series are those of the author(s) and do not necessarily reflect those of the Harvard Law School or of Harvard University. Research Working Papers have not undergone formal review and approval. Such papers are included in this series to elicit feedback and to encourage debate on important public policy challenges. Copyright belongs to the author(s). Papers may be downloaded for personal use only.

www.hrp.law.harvard.edu

Women's Victimization in Transitional Justice and their Fight for Democracy and Human Rights:

The Story of Taiwan¹

Yi-Li Lee

Visiting Scholar of Harvard Law School East Asian Legal Studies Program

Former Visiting Fellow of Harvard Law School Human Rights Program

Women, even though they were main victims of Taiwan's authoritarian regime, have been largely absent from the transitional justice mechanisms after Taiwan successfully transformed into a democracy. Following the discussion of women's victimization in times of political oppression and the negative impacts of women's absence in Taiwan's current transitional justice process, this essay argues that the recent incorporation of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women provides a gender-sensitive legal framework for female victims to overcome the social and institutional obstacles that they have faced in transitional justice issues.

I. Women's Victimization During the Authoritarian Regime

Taiwan was ruled by an authoritarian regime for almost four decades before it initiated a democratization process in the early 1990s. During this long authoritarian period, the Constitution of Republic of China (ROC Constitution) was suspended by the "Temporary Provisions Effective during the Period of National Mobilization for the Suppression of Communist Rebellion". To consolidate its ruling legitimacy and power, the nationalist government (Kuomintang, KMT) soon imposed the Martial Law Decree over Taiwan. Consequently, the freedoms of speech, press and association and other civil and political rights guaranteed by the ROC Constitution were suspended and a great number of restrictive laws were enacted.² In addition, the KMT regime established and strengthened a widespread and enhanced security system and used it as an instrument for suppressing dissent and anti-government activities. Hence, institutionalized human rights violations penetrated every sector of Taiwanese society for forty years. Among the most serious atrocities were the "February 28 Incident" in 1947,³ and the so-called "White Terror" that reached a peak in the 1950s and 1960s and continued to a lesser extent into the 1980s.⁴ It is believed that thousands of victims were tortured, enforcedly disappeared, or even killed in those human rights violations.⁵

¹ This paper also published by Justiceinfo.net at <https://www.justiceinfo.net/en/justice-reconciliation/34714-women-victimization-transitional-justice-taiwan.html>.

² JIUNN-RONG YEH, THE CONSTITUTION OF TAIWAN: A CONTEXTUAL ANALYSIS 31-32 (2016).

³ February 28 Incident" began when the Chinese police killed a Taiwanese woman selling cigarettes without official authorization, sparking a brutal state massacre. The detailed story of February 28 Incident can be found: Steven Phillips, Between Assimilation and Independence: Taiwanese Political Aspirations under Nationalist Chinese Rule, 1945-1948, in TAIWAN: A NEW HISTORY (Murray A. Rubinstein ed., 2015) at 292-296.

Women suffered various types of victimization in the context of institutionalized human rights violations. Some of them were intimidated, censored and prosecuted when they were suspected of anti-KMT regime activities by criticizing or thwarting its political agenda.⁶ Similar to male violations, these women were usually taken and interrogated and often beaten and seriously tortured by intelligence agents and military police without the guarantee of physical freedom and due process. In addition, political violence and its impacts severely destroyed women's lives. For example, when many Taiwanese male elites, including doctors, lawyers, teachers, journalists, businessmen and political figures were arrested, imprisoned or executed without a fair trial by the authoritarian regime, most of their female family members became widows. These women usually faced financial difficulties and endured all forms of discrimination, poverty and marginalization after losing their primary male economic providers. These female victims remained silent about their suffering until Taiwan's democratization in the early 1990s.

II. Success of Gender Equality through Democratization but Lack of Women's Presence in Transitional Justice Agenda

The authoritarian rule was gradually dismantled by several rounds of peaceful negotiations between the KMT regime and the opposition party after lifting the Martial Law Decree in 1987.⁷ Large-scale political and constitutional reforms were undertaken one after another when Taiwan transformed into a constitutional democracy. Political democratization gave rise to a much more open society and many legal limits on civil and political rights were removed, which empowered civil society and facilitated the establishment of human rights and women groups.⁸ These burgeoning human rights and women groups made great progress in improving the conditions of women through legal and judicial means. For instance, they launched several strategic constitutional litigation before the Constitutional Court of Taiwan, resulting in successful changes to law and policy on various gender issues. In addition, gender mainstreaming reforms were undertaken and relevant gender laws were enacted to improve women's economic and social status.⁹ The process of democratization also witnessed constitutional recognition of formal equality and quotas for ⁴ "White Terror" was the dark period ruled by the Martial Law Decree after February 28 Incident. Ten thousands of people were tortured, disappeared and killed because of political repression of the KMT regime. After the lifting of Martial Law in 1987, the government of Taiwan launched the truth investigation and compensated to the victims of the February 28 Incident and White Terror. The detailed story of the White Terror Period can be found: SHELLEY RIGGER, POLITICS IN TAIWAN: VOTING FOR DEMOCRACY 55-80 (1999).

⁵ Naitech Wu, Transitional Without Justice, or Justice Without History: Transitional Justice in Taiwan, 1 TAIWAN J. DEMOCRACY 1 82-92 (2005).

⁶ HSIU-HUA SHEN, WOMEN'S FEBRUARY 28: STORIES OF POLITICAL WIDOWS, 9-14 (1997) (In Chinese)

⁷ Yeh, supra note 1, at 36-38.

⁸ Jiunn rong Yeh, Marching Towards Civic Constitutionalism with Sunflowers, 45(1) H. K. L. J. 315 (2015)

⁹ Wen-Chen Chang, Public-interest Litigation in Taiwan: Strategy for Law and Policy Reforms in Course of Democratization, in PUBLIC INTEREST LITIGATION IN ASIA 142-144 (Po Jen Yap & Holning Lau eds. 2010); Wen-Chen Chang, An Isolated Nation with Global-minded Citizens: Bottom-up Transnational Constitutionalism in Taiwan, 4(3) NTU L. REV. 221 (2009)

women in electoral politics,¹⁰ which not only increased the number of female representatives in local and national legislatures, but also empowered some female victims of the former authoritarian regime to run for local or national elections. Through their political campaigns and activities, their past suffering drew public attention. Some of them even became famous political figures and held important official positions.

Democratization also required the newly elected governments to deal with past human rights violations.¹¹ Negotiation-oriented political transition led by male elites produced compensation-based transitional justice policies and mechanisms that mainly offered money to those who suffered past human rights violations in 1990s. Since women's rights groups and activists prioritized gender equal payment and equal rights in the family over gender-based violence of transitional justice in their reform agenda, the progress of gender equality failed to be reflected in the design of transitional justice mechanisms. Without a gender perspective, the transitional justice mechanisms not only failed to capture the complex gendered experiences during the authoritarian period, but also did not take the specific victimization of women into account. The absence of women in the design of transitional justice mechanisms has had negative effects on accountability, truth finding and social reconciliation. For example, the compensation-oriented transitional justice policies mechanisms fail to address the responsibility of perpetrators of human rights violations. This inhibits female victims from launching lawsuits to redress their physical and mental suffering. Without any accountability mechanism, female victims have huge difficulties knowing who was responsible for their suffering. In addition, the current limited truth investigation lacks a gender perspective and therefore could not fully document the historical accounts of women's victimization under the authoritarian regime. Furthermore, the rigid categories prescribed by compensation laws only partly satisfied the specific material and psychological needs of female victims. Those negative impacts inevitably produced social division and impeded political reconciliation for Taiwan.

III. Inclusion of Gender Perspective in New Transitional Justice Mechanisms when Taiwan Incorporated International Human Rights Laws in Domestic Legal Systems

Recent endeavors of civic groups pushed the Taiwanese government to incorporate international human rights laws in the domestic legal system.¹² For example, the government ratified the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) in 2007. In 2009, the government also ratified the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights. The Implementation Acts to those international human rights laws were enacted one after another to guarantee the rights in those laws directly applicable in the Taiwanese legal system.¹³ Among those treaties, the CEDAW provides some feasible guidelines to break the legal and social barriers that women have faced in the transitional justice process. For example, the CEDAW's Committee has repeatedly emphasized gender equality and gender inclusion shall be recognized and realized by all government agencies of state parties.¹⁴ In terms of transitional justice, the Committee, in its

¹⁰ Ruth Rubio-Marin & Wen-Chen Chang, Sites of Constitutional Struggle for Women's Equality, in ROUTLEDGE HANDBOOK OF CONSTITUTIONAL LAW 308 (Mark Tushnet, Thomas Fleiner, & Cheryl Saunders eds., 2012).

¹¹ Wu, supra note 4, at 83-94.

¹² Yeh, supra note 1, at 233-236.

¹³ Id.

¹⁴ Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women, General Recommendation No. 25 on Article 4, Paragraph 1, of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women on Temporary Special Measures, 2004, <http://www.refworld.org/docid/453882a7e0.html> (last visited September 15 2017); Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women, General

General Recommendation No. 30, clearly indicated that women's diverse experiences shall be integrated into all peacebuilding, peacemaking and reconstruction processes.¹⁵ When the CEDAW was incorporated in the Taiwanese legal system as part of domestic law through the 2012 Implementation Act, those gender principles in the CEDAW that guarantee women's access to justice, truth and reparation can be used to reform the existing transitional justice mechanisms and advance the overlooked status of female victims.

In January 2016, the opposition party – the Democratic Progressive Party (DPP) - won the presidency and parliamentary majority seats.¹⁶ This new democratic context offered the second chance to reopen the debate on transitional justice. Indeed, numerous laws and policies were proposed to address unresolved issues of transitional justice, such as the acquisition of the illegal party assets of the KMT party,¹⁷ the establishment of a truth commission to investigate past human rights violations and the revision or enactment of relevant laws to open up national archives. To avoid the previous failure of transitional justice mechanisms to address women's victimization, the principles of inclusivity and exposure to women's experiences of discrimination should be integrated into the new transitional justice reforms. For example, the proposal for the establishment of a truth commission shall guarantee gender quotas for the appointment of commissioners, provide a platform for female victims to speak up their unacknowledged past sufferings and create a gender-sensitive guide to include women's voices and experiences in truth recovery. The inclusion of a gender perspective into new transitional justice mechanisms not only helps in satisfying the needs of women victims in a holistic manner, but also contributes to tackling the root causes of past human rights violations. This also will enhance social reconciliation and democratic development for Taiwanese society.

Recommendation No. 28 on the Core Obligations of States Parties under Article 2 of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women, CEDAW/C/GC/28, December 16, 2010, <http://www.refworld.org/docid/4d467ea72.html> (last visited September 15 2017);

¹⁵ Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women, General Recommendation No. 30 on Women in Conflict Prevention, Conflict and Post-conflict Situations, CEDAW/C/GC/30, October 18, 2013, <http://www.ohchr.org/Documents/HRBodies/CEDAW/GComments/CEDAW.C.CG.30.pdf> (last visited September 15 2017)

¹⁶ Peng Ming-min, Looking for Transitional Justice in a New Taiwan, Taipei Times, February 18, 2016, <http://www.taipeitimes.com/News/editorials/archives/2016/02/18/2003639608> (last visited 13 July 2017).

¹⁷ Abraham Gerber, Sparks Fly at Forum on 'Ill-Gotten Assets', Taipei Times, February 21, 2016, <http://www.taipeitimes.com/News/front/archives/2016/02/21/2003639843> (last visited 13 July 2017)